Notion introduces workspace credits for AI agents¹

Notion's pricing has moved from a flat add-on to bundled Business AI and now workspace credits. The credits track agent activity rather than completed work; the model is relevant as you finalize Tandem's Q4 packaging.

Notion has moved through three AI pricing models: a $10 flat add-on in 2023, AI bundled into Business in 2025, and workspace credits for agents in 2026. The credits track content read, agent steps, run frequency and model choice—not the work completed.

According to the source, monthly credits cost $10 per 1,000 and annual credits cost $13 per 1,000. As you finalize Tandem's Q4 AI pricing and packaging, Notion's sequence gives you a third model to assess: charge for agent usage rather than bundle AI or sell a flat add-on.

Editor's note: The story directly informs your Q4 pricing choice with three successive models and explicit credit prices.

AI

Gemini can summarize project information across connected apps²

The assistant can pull deadlines, documents and task lists together, but Google has not detailed third-party app limits or plan availability.

Gemini can reference deadlines in Calendar, documents in Drive and task lists, then surface project summaries or next steps across those sources.

The article says dedicated project-management tools generally offer features such as Gantt charts, workload balancing and client-facing dashboards.

Atlassian makes expanded MCP generally available³

The integration adds cross-product tools, multi-step workflows and enterprise controls for external AI clients.

Atlassian has made its expanded MCP integration generally available to external AI clients. It offers more than 220 tools and supports cross-product tasks, such as turning a Loom transcript into Confluence release notes. Atlassian says the integration respects existing permissions and provides administrative controls. Internal benchmarks report up to 25% fewer tokens on the same Jira and Confluence work.

ONE THOUGHT Notion's credit prices make the Q4 packaging choice tangible; Gemini and Atlassian show different routes for AI into work.
